◆ Living in the countryside ◆ 2015/03/01 00:23 Hello, this is my husband. Before you know it, it's already March. Starting with the production of beet seedling s this month, we are about to begin our fourth season as Emen Farm. Looking back, it's been 6 years since I put an end to my life as an office worker in Tokyo and set my sights on becoming a farmer. I think I've gotten used to farm life and rural life quite a bit. Shirataki, Engaru Town, where we live, is a so-called ``rural" place with only a few small shops. If you want to buy something small that you can't find at that store, you have to go to Engaru-cho, about 40 km away, and if you want to do some serious shopping, you have to go to Asahikawa, about 90 km away. When I lived in Tokyo, there were several convenience stores and supermarkets between the station and my home.	profile No Image Author:Ezura Farm [About us] Just before the age of 30, I ended my life as an office worker in Tokyo and moved to Hokkaido. After three years of training, she realized her dream of working as a farmer in Hokkaido in April 2012. tryside in an inconvenient way, but in reality, you hardly feel any inconvenience.

If you order groceries from an online supermarket, they will arrive on the same day or the next day at the latest, and daily necessities can sometimes be delivered the next day with free shipping. In the era when the internet and logistics did not cover every corner of the country like now, I think there would have been a big wall between living in the city and the countryside, but the internet and logistics networks have developed. Nowadays, it can be said that those barriers have become extremely low.

In recent years, with the rise of low-cost carriers (LCCs), not only information and logistics but also the movement of people, travel between cities and rural areas can sometimes cost only a few thousand yen. Sometimes it costs more to travel from your home to the airport ^^;

In fact, in the countryside you can experience the blessings of nature that you can never get in the city. From now on, I would like you to take on the challenge of living in the countryside more and more.

As soon as you step outside, you'll be greeted by a star-filled sky. Just a short drive in your car and you'll be greeted with a view like this.
